Although the number of CI users over the age of 30 years and learning Japanese appears large (12.1% of the older speakers), there is evidence of a sharp increase in the rate of ELD in this segment of the population \[[@pone.0205335.ref048], [@pone.0205335.ref050]\]. It would be helpful to monitor whether this segment is also represented in the overall number of LI cases. If a sudden rise of the number of young speakers can be demonstrated, this would probably indicate that the number of young adults with a second language in a different country may be growing. We have found overall good agreement between the results of studies with similar methodologies (in particular, the agreement between our first rate estimates and those of the study of Tatsuoka and colleagues \[[@pone.0205335.ref032]\]). The systematic difference between the outcome of the two rates (roughly a 3% increase in the rate over the 10-year period), however, is comparable to the mean difference (+2.21%, 95% CI: +2.63, +2.80) between two sets of population estimates of 6 different world languages that have been reported

In Belgium there are six regional languages, all of which are spoken in a region that covers 9% of the national territory. If we take into account the fact that many of the inhabitants are multilingual, regional language organisations are the most important providers of services to a large population. In this study, the methodology and goals of such institutions are defined, and the demographic, social, economic and cultural parameters that are typical of regional language users are examined. The impact of these institutions on health and education is also discussed, as well as the contributions of regional language organisations to health insurance schemes. The results show that the regional language organisations play a prominent role in social and cultural life in the regions of 6d1f23a050
